In the same house, new collaboration can be born

By Becca Vaclavik

When the College of Music community walks the new-and-improved halls of Imig, they'll be joined in two spaces by a new set of collaborators: artists from the Department of Theatre & Dance.

Imig will now include a small rehearsal space for both theatre and dance disciplines on the first floor. And on the third floor, just across the hall from several faculty studios, the expansion will feature a large dance hall, complete with tall ceilings designed especially for hanging and rehearsing with aerial points.

“It’s extraordinary to have that space. It will absolutely facilitate the work that we do,” says Department of Theatre & Dance Chair Erika Randall. The cohabited spaces will help to dissolve the silos that sometimes exist across the performing arts, instead creating a central location that can serve as a hub for collaboration.

“Dance is so interested in decolonizing space and bodies,” says Randall.

“How can we be agents for that in the new Imig building and foster a decentering and recentering of space? Things happen in conversations that pass when you’re actually in community. It’s just such a beautiful way for us to all start to experience the arts.”

“Through both of these spaces, theatre and dance students and musicians will interact—we’re all opening our doors to be good neighbors.”
